

Our products are used throughout the world, not least for restoration purposes, and we export to over 50 countries. Our paints are even used by the royal household: master Albert Roelofs gave lessons in painting to Queen Wilhelmina and her daughter Princess Juliana, using exclusively Old Holland paints. In the factory in Driebergen we have set up a museum displaying old tools and antique pigments and resins, and it goes without saying that you are extremely welcome to look around

Old Holland was established by skilled in 1664. At the time, traditional crafts and trades were embodied in guilds. In the painters' guild, the master taught the craftsman, and the apprentice made the paint for the craftsman and the master. If the craftsman was considered sufficiently skilled, he in turn became a master and his standing rose. Old Holland came into being in a guild of this kind, of which in its last form Willem Roelofs was the master, Albert Roelofs the craftsman and Roelof Roelofs the apprentice.

The Roelofs family lived in Scheveningen, where production was carried out until the early 1980s, and it is for this reason that the place name Scheveningen occurs frequently in the names of the colours. Old Holland has over three centuries of experience and tradition behind it and in that time has proved beyond doubt that the reliability of traditional behind it passed. At the Old Holland Verwen Makerij Sinds 1664, which is now located at Driebergen Rijsenburg, we continue to use recipes, passed down from generation to generation. Our expert staff work daily with love and dedication on the preparation of superior products, thereby enabling many artists to achieve on the canvas the end result that they are striving for.
